DREAM GIRL

AN early Saturday sun smiled down on the corner of Hill and Elm streets where Denny Rogers, a lean, freckled-faced young man was busy polishing the hood of "Clementine," his old blue jalopy. Although the cleaning cloth ran lightly over the bumpy metal hood, there was a rather distant and unhappy look in Denny's clear grey eyes.

"Clem" wasn't getting her usual pampering from Denny this morning; he just didn't have his heart in it!

He had received two phone calls that morning, both from Mary Courtney. He had always felt like calling Mary, but never had, somehow. She was so beautiful . . . with her sweet smile, twinkling blue eyes, and flame-red hair, she made him feel rather shy. At school, he often found himself admiring her from afar, and weaving pleasant fantasies about her. She had become his "Dream Girl"!

Then, this morning she had called him. She was president of the Alpha Gamma sorority and was asking him if he could drive her and her sorority sisters out to the country for a sorority picnic. Vistas opened before him of green, sunlit meadows embroidered with white clover, a limpid blue lake . . . and Mary's bright hair near him all day. He told her he'd drive them most willingly, but about twenty minutes later, the phone had rung again.

Once more it was Mary, but this time her sweet voice carried a bitter message.

"Thank you so much, Denny, for being such a good guy, but we won't need your car after all. When I told the girls we were going with you, they said they were afraid your car might be too small, and not safe enough for the whole crowd to pile into . . . so Helen Huston got Rodney Furze and he's taking us in his father's convertible. I'm sure you won't mind not having to bother with us. Thanks loads anyway!"

So he wandered out to commune with "Clementine," and here he was, caressing her sadly with the polishing cloth.

"It's not your fault," he told her gently. "I know what a great little gal you are, because I practically put you all together myself, bolt by bolt. Too bad you couldn't be a little bigger, though, and slightly more respectable looking! It would have been nice spending the day with Mary."

Suddenly, something in the distance caught his eye. He had a dark intuition, and when he turned to look, discovered he was right! It was Rodney Furze deliberately driving down Elm street on the way to the picnic, his smiling face surrounded by the sparkling smiles of several assorted blondes and brunettes, and there, in front, a pretty redhead! She was waving to him, his "dream girl," Mary Courtney!

He waved back at her and tried to look pleasant as the yellow convertible drew closer. The sleek bright vehicle shone in the sun like a shield of battle, and Rodney Furze sat at the wheel with all the airs of a conquering hero. Denny shot a desperate glance at poor old battered "Clem."

Then the yellow car was rolling slowly past him, and Rodney was saying, "Hey, Denny, why don't you give up and admit she's ready for the junk heap?"

All the girls giggled, all but Mary. Denny was glad she hadn't laughed, but he felt anger sweeping over him in huge gusts as he looked at Rodney!

"Well, at least it's my own buggy and doesn't belong to my father!" he shouted.

"Buggy is right!" sneered Rodney. "But why don't you get a horse?"

"Witty, aren't you?" Denny said.

"S'long, chum! Don't knock yourself out!" Rodney replied, stepping on the accelerator and speeding the car out of sight.

Denny just stood there, shooting off sparks.

At this moment, Ted Collins came swinging around the corner and eyed his friend with surprise.

"Hi, chum, why so glum?" he queried.

Denny looked up and shook off some of his gloom.

"Hi, Ted!" he answered.

"Aw, c'mon," laughed Ted, "you can't hide anything from an old pal! Why I'll eat my varsity letter if it's not some gal that's weighin' on your mind!"

"As a matter of fact," he admitted, "I was thinking about Mary Courtney." He went on to tell Ted about the phone calls, then added gloomily, "I'm afraid she's the type that falls for a big car. She dropped me like a hot potato for Rodney!"

"That doesn't mean anything," countered Ted. "It's just possible that the girls really needed more room than 'Clementine' can offer. Besides, Mary may honestly think she's doing you a favor by going with Rodney. After all, she doesn't know you've got a crush on her; I'll bet you never even bothered to tell her you like her!"

Denny had to admit this was so.

"Then how do you expect her to be considerate of your feelings if she doesn't even know what they are?" demanded Ted.

"You're right, I've been a fool!" agreed Denny. "But it may be kind of late to change things now, after the way I must have looked to her today!"

Suddenly Ted startled the air with a ringing laugh!

"I'll bet someone else looks far worse!" he chuckled, swinging Denny around in the other direction.

Denny didn't know what was happening until he saw what Ted saw. The big yellow convertible was coming back down Elm Street, driven not by Rodney, but by P. J. Furze, Rodney's father. Next to him sat Rodney, the very picture of a model boy except for the peculiar purple color that pervaded his face. Ranged in the other seats were the girls of the Alpha Gamma sorority, each with her own private brand of consternation clearly written on her brow.

Then Denny saw Mary. She was apparently gesturing to P. J. to slow down and stop. Ted and Denny watched spellbound, while the car halted near them, and Mary got out, the other girls following her onto the pavement. Then, with a sheepishly mumbled "Good-bye," Rodney slammed the doors with finality and Furzes senior and junior disappeared down the street.

Denny's heart flip-flopped as the girls walked toward him across the lawn, Mary's graceful form leading the rest. Before he knew it, some one lovely with a cloud of red hair was talking to him.

"Perhaps you're tired of seeing us by now, but we're back again!" Mary Courtney laughed teasingly. "As we were stopping for a light near the square, who should be crossing the street but Rodney's father himself. Apparently Rodney hadn't asked permission to take the car today, and his Dad needed it for an important business trip, so back they went with P. J. madder than all get-out! I'd feel sorry for Rodney except he was so rude to you this morning. And we weren't so nice either! That's why we're here now . . . to apologize to you. Can you ever forgive us?"

Denny was listening with mute rapture, caught in the blue haze of her eyes which seemed to envelop him with their warmth.

"Of course, I forgive you! I'm very fond of you, Mary!" he managed to stammer. "I always meant to tell you, but this seems to be the first time I've been able to say it!"

Mary answered with a delightful smile and a tender peck on the cheek. Denny knew he didn't feel shy any more. He had a feeling he wanted to do something gallant and kind, but didn't quite know what it was.

Then Ted, grinning, said, "Well, are you going to take these girls on their picnic or aren't you?"

"That's it!" cried Denny. "If you fair ladies still crave a picnic," he waved his arms in the direction of "Clementine," "my chariot awaits!"

Apparently the girls were more mellow from the morning's experience, because they seemed to have lost their dislike of jalopies and crowded into "Clementine." Mary made certain that she had the seat next to the driver. No one was ever prouder of his car than Denny was, when he strutted around to the driver's seat and drove off with his "dream girl" close by his side!
